43rd Engineer Regiment (GS)

43rd Engineer Regiment History:

"After the Japs had been driven back into the ocean, with supplies and equipment brought by plane and boat, work was started. We borrowed some equipment from the Japs. Grass is cut, the roots stripped, while planning and laying out. Camp Site. After stripping, we plow, harrow, and sheepsfoot, carry in, and shape the crown. Sometimes a fill is brought in. The strip is primed and mat is laid. Some strips are paved with bitumen heated and shot. Rock crushed, loaded and spread, but we found hand work too slow so we built a spreader from an old transmission. While constructing, we serve many units with water and grains of sand. Where docks are needed piles are driven. Many docks make a port. Lumber at the mill. Working day and night we reach a point where we have formation, improve our camp. Saint and sinner. Our heroes are decorated and our dead revered. Bridges and still more bridges. Docks. High roads and low roads. Port Installations. Hospital buildings. Tanks and lines. Finished product."

One photograph with caption reading: "Illustrating method that a flamethrower operator could use to attack Jap machine gun nest. Soldier with rifle is dugout represents Jap and shows rear entrance to the emplacement. The normal field of fire is in the direction opposite to that in the which the "Jap" rifle is pointing. A flamethrower burst released by the operator in the position of the US soldier would either ricochet into the entrance of the dugout, killing the occupant immediately, or the heat would momentarily immobilize him until the operator could advance and send a burst directly into the dugout." Valves of the flamethrowers have already been turned on and the flamethrowers are ready to fire. Since this position was developed for all-around defense, the approach was made frontally. Supporting riflemen which were not used in this action, should have been a few yards on either side of the flamethrower operators and firing into strongpoint to force the Japs under cover by fire superiority.” Date: probably December 1942 – August 1943.
